Comparison of four methods for determination of base composition of amplified DNA sequences. Four methods for determination of base composition of human genomic DNA sequences amplified by the polymerase chain reaction were compared. Method I uses a denaturing polyacrylamide gel electrophoresis and silver staining. In method II DNA fragments are separated on a DNA sequencing gel and stained with toluidine blue. The third method is the enzymatic ligation of DNA ends (T4 DNA ligase) followed by polyacrylamide gel electrophoresis and silver staining. The last method is automated sequencing of DNA by the Maxam and Gilbert method (MGM) and utilizes a DNA sequencer with multichannel capillary electrophoresis and gel staining of reaction products. Among these methods, all methods including MGM are laborious and costly. The advantage of MGM is its high throughput capacity. However, it has a low accuracy. All methods can be used for the determination of base composition of DNA fragments ranging from 100 to several hundreds nucleotides in length.
