But a new online resource is attempting to make it a little simpler - at least if your journal has any money at stake. Ben Goldacre, the author of books including "Bad Science" and "Bad Pharma," is leading the charge on "Journal Transparency," a new online resource that aims to make it easier for authors, editors, reviewers and other journal staff to gain a better understanding of their organization's policies and procedures, and to keep others from finding out too much about them. "There are so many of these policies that it's going to take years before we reach a complete understanding of the required components," Goldacre told Reuters Health by phone. "So, in a very cynical way, we put together a site that makes it as simple as possible for people to find out what's going on and who has ownership of their data and who has the right to make decisions for them and what kind of training they need." The goal is to leave as little mystery as possible when it comes to research published in science journals, and to make their policies and procedures more transparent, Goldacre said. "Our aim is to force transparency for science publishers into the 21st century," Goldacre said. "We want people to have the information that they need to understand
