Is this code legal in C? `const int a = 2; int (*p)() = &a; int main() { int i = *p; }` The assignment to p is impossible, the left side being a const. Will it then "really" be a const int? It seems to me as if i will have an arbitrary value, since the value stored in *p might be anything. Do we know any way to convince the compiler that the const is not violated here? A: You are not allowed to do that. C11, section 6.7.3.1/3 A declaration of a parameter as "array of type" shall be adjusted to "qualified pointer to type", where the type qualifiers (if any) are those specified within the [and] of the array type derivation, and the qualifier void if the parameter is declared without an identifier. That is, if your declaration is `int a = 2; int *p(); p` would be declared as `int (p())() = &a;` So, the actual type of p here is `int ()()`. As you rightly point out, the actual type of the expression a is `int`, not `const int`. Consequently, the result of your expression is not guaranteed to be an `const int`. Q: Anyone here who can help me play with forum based record player? I am trying to put together an old school record player out of
