Neurogenesis in adult human brain: a systematic review of the literature and critical discussion of stem cell technology with regard to adult neurogenesis. Adult neurogenesis is regarded as a central component of the plasticity of the adult brain, and is thought to be required for the maintenance and function of cognitive functions. The brain derives its plasticity from mechanisms in which neural stem cells (NSCs) amplify the numbers of both neurons and glial cells in order to cover the expansion of damaged tissue. Although it has been claimed that these mechanisms are engaged in the process of recovery from various neurological diseases or injuries, the quantity and quality of the available evidence are limited and controversial. Here, we present a critical analysis of the evidence for such mechanisms, and propose some guidelines for the future research. Furthermore, we discuss the clinical perspectives regarding the regenerative or reparative potential of adult neurogenesis. If Canada is now an energy superpower, it shouldn't be. The truth is that, while our electricity and natural gas sectors are in excellent shape and great need of and welcoming investment, our oil and natural gas sectors are very weak and need serious attention. It's past time that we invested in our oil and gas sector — one of Canada's greatest strengths — and started to put an end to this energy superpower. We have an opportunity now to put energy policies in place that, if they don't immediately return Canada to energy superpower status, at least put us in a position where we will be well positioned to compete and win the game of global energy supremacy — long-term, and likely for decades to come. Maintaining peak production capability I believe Canada is a great energy superpower. We have the world's largest known reserves of oil and natural gas, we have virtually limitless sources of clean and reliable power from our hydro, wind and tides, and we have the world's largest proven and probable reserves of oil, which offer significant reserve growth potential if the necessary investments are made. In the interim, while Canada's policymakers ponder a new energy strategy, our country's energy superpower status is defined by our peak production capability. We are pulling ahead of the world in that respect. During the last four decades, Canada has quietly built a formidable ability to extract, process and transport our own vast oil and gas reserves. But we're still not in the position to benefit much from our oil and gas investments. When it comes to the massive investment required to develop
