The containment layer should be soft (rubbery) and offer resistance to heat and cold. Some prior art containsors include a thin oil impregnated paper containment layer. However, a soft containment layer does not well adhere to a PSDAS, which prevents it from being removed from the PSDAS when the product is perforated. Moreover, the application of oil to a thin paper layer is expensive. An alternate containment layer is comprised of a fiber-reinforced plastic layer impregnated with a thermoset. For example, the thermoset may be urethane or epoxy. It is less expensive to apply the thermoset material, and provides good adhesion to the PSDAS, thus allowing the layers to be easily removed from the PSDAS. Unfortunately, the thermoset materials are more expensive than paper or other cheaper materials and are much more susceptible to oxidative degradation. Therefore, the containment layer must be protected from light, air, and water. The containment layer typically must be at least about 10 mils thick. In order to protect the thermoset from oxygen and moisture, the containment layer is placed over a perforated operable plastic film. However, the containment layer and film is not very durable in the standard polymer film materials, and tear very easily, creating a weak point of the contained material. Typically, the containment layer is placed around the central point of a cylindrical tube. The cylindrical tube allows the containment layer to be slit, or broken, and allow the contained material to be easily removed when the contained material is perforated. The containment
